

Digital MakeOver, Part II

Adrienne Keiner

I like how she has integrated images of her students on her site. That makes it come alive and personal. I have some images of my students in action so I will integrate those on my student page. I like how the content is shown on a background as if it is on a desk. I am pleased with how the formatting of my page, though I can see that there are different styles that can serve the same purpose. These styles are based on personality, but can also differ based on subject and grade level.

Kevin Cram

His introductory page reads like a blog which is an interesting way to introduce yourself to the world. Also, he utilizes a banner image at the top of each page. That bring continuity to his site. I will incorporate images from my classroom or from the web that represent my interests.

Joanna Doyle

I found her welcome page to be very “welcoming”. The person who she is and who she teaches is evident from that introduction. Her tone in her writing on the site is very conversational, possibly even poetic. This is reaching out to the reader to capture and engage them in a different way. I like the “read my real bio option if that’s what you really want” option. Again, all of this points to an individual style and somewhat related to the grade level she teaches. I am going to consider having a entry page which allows links to each of my other tabs as a way to introduce what is important to me in my career, my students.
